How long do supermarkets keep CCTV footage?

In general, properties keep CCTV footage as long as they have the storage capacity to do so. In most cases, this means supermarkets and other properties keep footage for around 30 to 90 days. However, this varies a great deal. Some only keep footage for a few hours while others may retain it indefinitely.

How long can personal data be retained?

You cannot retain the personal data longer than it is actually needed. Rather than a fixed number of years, how long data can be retained is closely tied to the use and type of data. Any personal data no longer needed should be deleted or anonymised.

Why is security important in retail stores and supermarkets?

All retail stores and supermarkets have theft-prone areas such as secure cash offices and storage rooms that are susceptible to external and internal theft. It is very important to secure these areas from unauthorised access using secure locking mechanisms.

How does a supermarket security system work?

By combining surveillance camera systems, alarm systems, and access control systems, supermarkets can create a robust security infrastructure that safeguards their premises, assets, and personnel. These systems work together seamlessly to provide comprehensive protection against theft, vandalism, and other security threats.

How long can a business keep personal data?

Much time and attention is given to lawfully obtaining data in the first instance, however, once a business has collected personal data fairly and lawfully, the question follows: how long can they keep it? Put simply, there is no fixed time period set out in the UK GDPR.
