Either way, the solar company "owns" the panels, and you are required to buy all the power they produce. So in essence you are paying two electricity bills, one from APS and the other from the solar company. Generally the solar cost is lower than the APS cost, which is why it's a good deal. You also don't have a loan on your record or pay interest.

In the winter months electricity from APS is nearly free during peak solar hours, and with super cooling in the summer, I'm able to escape nearly all demand charges. I had actually signed an install contract that fell through due to some unusual roofing issues, and I am glad it did -- it's a shame APS does so much to disincentivize solar.
